"NOW IT CAN BE TOLD"

Rabbi Maurice N. Eisendrath

The Federation Campaign is over, and in the words of Philip Gibbs, "Now it can be told." While the drive was in progress, in order to keep up the esprit de corps we had to maintain that all was going well and that we would not cease our labors until we had gone "over the top." Now that the vast majority of the cards are in and the total amount collected is known, we cannot—if we be honest—escape the indictment contained therein. Sorrowfully we must admit that our baneful prophecy has been fulfilled, and that we have learned some unpleasant things about certain of our brethren. Subscriptions were reduced in the face of greater need than we have known before. Retrenchment in philanthropic responsibility has preceded retrenchment anywhere else. Certain exceptions there may be, but we personally have not heard of any luxurious motor cars being offered on the block nor of any palatial mansions being vacated, yet scores of poverty stricken families will be dispossessed this winter and children will die of malnutrition because their selfish brethren, who like to rant about "Kol Yisroel Haverim", have deserted them in their hour of direst want. Less than half of our quota has been reached, and although we may shout our protests to the skies and point to the failure of the Federation for Community Service likewise to reach its goal, we dare not thus dissemble nor conceal the lamentable fact that neither the Protestant nor the Catholic Drive fell nearly so woefully short of the amount collected last year as did our own campaign. It is a horrible indictment indeed. We Jews who prate of our close fellowship with our co-religionists, we who are so easily moved to tears and emotional demonstration, exhibited the most miserable showing of all the campaigns held this Fall. We grasped avidly at every subterfuge and alibi and took mean advantage of the situation. It is not—as some will urge—that we Jews are so much poorer than the Christian nor because our losses were greater. We too have our wealthy and our middle class who dodged their rightful responsibility upon the slightest provocation. We scurvily proved our callosity and indifference to the heartrending cry of the suffering. We all of us became hysterical, that is all. We fastened our purse strings tighter than ever. We have failed our Jewish poor. Where, oh where, is our "Jewish heart"?

In the light of such sorry circumstances, we cannot but feel that it is with full justification that we should apply the word Slacker to those who have turned a deaf ear and a hardened heart to the cry of the downtrodden and distressed. We can think of no more fitting word. It is a truly pregnant word; it is an epithet of contempt and yet we are of the opinion that if it could have been so universally applied to those who for one reason or another refused to murder their fellow creatures in time of war, why should not the selfsame term be applied with equal force and shame to those who refuse to save their fellows in time of peace. In fact, we are inclined to think that before the bar of ultimate justice, the war time slacker the conscientious objector and pacifist will be granted far more tender treatment than those greedy and covetous mortals who cling so tenaciously and selfishly to whatever they possess. To me, none is so truly deserving of that opprobrious title "slacker" than those who are recreant to their communal duties and their decent responsibilities. Some day we shall shun these peace time slackers—ostracize and avoid them as conscientiously as we so mistakenly did those who loved their fellow men too well to butcher them on the field of battle. Some day we'll more sanely judge our brethren. We shall honor those who save rather than those who slay, and shall find some worthy and adequate punishment for those who, through their failure to give to charity amounts commensurate with their wealth, indirectly but none the less surely jeopardize, and even take, human life.

Some method must be devised to prevent these slackers, those who so meanly and in such miserly fashion cast a mere pittance of their vast wealth to the poor, and those who, from amid their comfortable surroundings give not at all—from escaping their rightful obligations. One such expedient of which we have thought and spoken frequently before was brought recently to public attention by the recommendation on the part of our own Alderman Nathan Phillips to the effect that the city itself tax all its constituents for philanthropic purposes. The specific plan which he suggested may or may not be feasible, but the principle cannot but be upheld. It is the only solution, and the only fair means that can be employed. A tax on property such as Aledrman Phillips suggested would no doubt permit too many—tenants and landless individuals—still to escape. A tax on income would on the other hand prove more expedient. There is no reason whatever why persons of large income and plenteous means should not be forced by law to share their substance with those who, through no fault of their own, have fallen by the wayside in life's turbulent and chaotic chase. No man has the right to escape. And if he himself has not sufficient conscience to recognize this fact, then the community must exact of him his due.

Of course, it was immediately objected that this would destroy the spontaneity and joy of voluntary giving. How absurd! In the first place, where is that joy and spontaneity? A few scattered examples of noble charity we still have. But they are very few. Wherefore all these ballyhoos and high pressure drives, if giving is so happy a thing? Wherefore all this reducing of philanthropic solicitors to the veritable role of pariahs and beggars ere they separate the majority from their petty gifts? We may as well be realists enough to admit that that overflowing heart of yesterday has almost wholly capitulated to the greedy money-grubbing and competetive selfishness of today. And besides, in what way is voluntary philanthropy thus denied? Such a system would take care only of absolute and palliative needs. There would still be ample opportunity for preventative charity and more constructive schemes. Clinics, institutes, community centers, camps and clubs could still be endowed and supported by the generous few. Such objections therefore dodge the issue and are hypocritically untrue.

To be sure, great difficulty would be encountered in attempting to adopt such a scheme. All the selfish souls who know that by such a plan their contributions would be increased or that they would be forced thereby to give something for the first time will climb upon the band wagon and shout to the skies that such a suggestion, if adopted, would wholly relieve personal responsibility and destroy the pleasure in giving. But "now it must be told;" the true facts must be faced, and selfishness must yield to a full recognition of every citizen's adequate responsibility If we are not generous nor decent enough to do so of our own free will, then we must be forced so to do. The day of reckoning is near at hand. We have had enough of these slackers. A community's welfare cannot be gambled nor be made to depend on the caprice and whimsical fancies of altogether already too obsequiously pampered individuals. Nor can the fate of thousands be permitted to rest upon the stock quotations in Wall Street. It is time to act. Let us agitate for legislation. Let us make charity obligatory. Let us care respectfully and decently for our poor.

VISITOR OUTLINES AIMS OF COUNCIL OF JEWISH WOMEN

Religion, education, and philanthropy were cited as the foundation upon which the National Council of Jewish Women has raised its present structure, by Mrs. I. K. E. Prager, of Boston, Mass., in her address at the opening meeting of the Montreal Council Wednesday afternoon, November 5 in Windsor Hall.

Mrs. Prager, who is secretary for the National Council of Jewish Women of the United States, with which are affiliated several councils in various centres in Canada, said that in so far as religion is concerned, the National Council has as its slogan, "Give the community what it needs," and in order to avoid overlapping it establishes Sabbath schools only in those centres where there are no Jewish religious facilities. The Council membership embraces women who are Orthodox, Conservative or Reformed Jews.

In the educational department, the aim is to fit Jewish women to take their part in the life of the community, by inculcating a sense of civic responsibility, especially among those who are recent arrivals from European countries. The immigration work, coming under this department, which used to be conducted at the point of debarkation is now begun at the point of embarkation. Survey work among foreign-born Jewish people has been carried out, with a view to helping in child welfare, the care of members of families separated perops by the quota laws, and similar work. Mrs. David Notkin, the incoming president of the Montreal Council, presided, and Mrs. Martin Wolff thanked Mrs. Prager. Mrs. Max Bernfeld read the third annual report of Council Camp. Camp reunion will be held during the Chanukah holidays.

NEW EDUCATIONAL CENTRE TO OPEN SOON

The Executive Committee of the United Talmud Torahs of Montreal, Bernard Levitt, President; Lionel J. Coviensky, Hiram Levy, Abraham Raginsky, Vice-Presidents; Jacob Albert, Treasurer; and Louis Glazer, Honorary Secretary, announce that the new Hebrew Educational Centre on Saint Joseph Boulevard West will be open for inspection shortly.

MONTEFIORE HEBREW ORPHAN'S HOME ANNUAL MEETING

Montefiore Hebrew Orphans' Home, Manee Street, during the past year, as outlined in a report by Ald Max Seigler, comptroller, at the annual meeting held Sunday afternoon, November 9, cleared an outstanding debt of $15,000 and managed to show an operating surplus after all charges had been paid.

Ald. Seigler pointed out that isolation rooms, the maintenance of a fine summer home at Ste. Agathe for residents of the orphanage and a broadening curriculum of study had been engaged in. He emphasized the fact that the quarters were taxed to the utmost to meet the obligations of the institution to the Jewish community. Twenty-eight children were admitted during the past year; while the average number maintained was 60. A mortgage of $17,500 still remains, but the incoming board of directors pledge themselves to discharge the debt during 1931.

L. B. Daniels, president, expressed his appreciation of the directors.

S. Lerner, Chairman of the Board of Education, received praise for his work at the orphanage. I. M. Rubinovitch, R. H. Blumenthal, M. Abramovitz and Morris Schneiderman were others who received commendation.

COMMENTARIES

By Rabbi HARRY J. STERN, of Montreal, Associate Contributing Editor

SOBER-MINDED

One blessing this world-wide economic depression is certainly bringing to man. It is helping him to become "sober-minded". Thus multitudes who have, heretofore, been intoxicated with their self importance because of their material possessions, are now beginning to learn something of humility and reverence. In seeking a way out of the mental depression caused by stock-market crashes, men and women are commencing to realize that successful and satisfactory living can only be found in the application of religion to every phase of life.

THE TALMUD TORAHS

Reports come to me that all is not well with the local Talmud Torahs—Funds are needed to complete the new centre—teachers have not been paid in months, etc. What a pity! And this in the face of an unwarranted boast that Montreal is predominately Orthodox. Of course Jewish Education ought to be the concern of all Jews be they of the conservative or liberal persuasion. True! But has it not been the claim of so-called Orthodox Jews that they, and they only, are the guardians of Torah? Shall we say—judging from the failures of the United Talmud Torahs—that the local Orthodox community is guilty of merely mouthing empty phrases in declaring its allegiance to Torah?

"JEWS IN HIGH OFFICE"

The past week in the United States two Jews were elected as Governors. In Oregon, Julius Mier has become the chief executive, while Arthur Seligman is the head of the State Government in New Mexico. This indicates the liberality and progressiveness of the United States regarding the privileges of citizenship. The Canadian Jew will have to wait patiently and perhaps for a long time before progressiveness will make it possible for Jews to occupy high offices in the Government of the Dominion.

ABYSSINIA

Raf Tafari was recently crowned Emperor of Abyssinia. And what excitement his coronation caused! Presidents sent framed autographed photographs and kings sent coronation cakes, wine and even aeroplanes. All this "flirting" with Tafari is caused by the fact that many white nations are anxious to go into Abyssinia to obtain "footholds" in the dark continent of Africa. The white man needs more and more land. Making a fuss over the crowning of a "dark king" is a new form of conquest.

And while we are thinking about Abyssinia we cannot but help wondering how the Falashas will fare now under the rule of the lion of Judah, the King of Kings—Tafari. These Falashas are our dark Jewish brethren who have been recently re-discovered and re-claimed for Judaism. At any rate Mazol Tov to Raf Tafari who is now occupying the throne first established by Solomon and the Queen of Sheba!

Mail Box

Denver Colo.,
November 6, 1930.

Editor,
Canadian Jewish Review:

It would be greatly appreciated by the Jewish Consumptives' Relief Society, if you would kindly insert in your valued publication a suitable notice that Dr. A. Auslender is no longer connected with The Jewish Consumptives' Relief Society of Denver, Colo., in any form or manner. His connection with us terminated in June 1930.

We also would appreciate the publication of a notice from us denying emphatically recent rumors that our institution does not accept patients from the East. Such rumors are shamelessly malicious and false, and are being spread for the sole purpose of misleading the Jewish public. The Jewish Consumptives' Relief Society of Denver, Colo., has been, and is accepting patients from the Eastern states. Since its very inception 26 years ago, patients from the East have formed a majority in its sanatorium.

Your publication of the above facts will be not only a favor to us, but a service to the many of your readers who are friends and supporters of The Jewish Consumptives' Relief Society of Denver, Colo.

Sincerely yours,
HENRY ROSEN

Marriages

Rosenthal-Comm

The marriage of Rose, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. H. Comm, to Samuel Rosenthal, son of Mr. and Mrs. U. I. Rosenthal, was solemnized Sunday, November 9, at 4.30 at Shaar Hashomayim Synagogue. Rabbi H. Abramowitz officiated. The bride was given away by her father. Over her white satin gown on Grecian lines with short puff sleeves, fell her veil of net draped with a cap of Chantilly lace, a wreath of orange blossoms at the back and a cluster at one side. She carried lilies-of-the-valley. Miss Sari Comm, sister of the bride, was her only attendant, gowned in a pencil blue dress with hat and shoes to match and corsage of pink roses. Isidore Godinsky was best man. Mrs. Comm, mother of the bride, wore black georgette and cream lace with hat and shoes to match and a corsage of roses. Mrs. Rosenthal, mother of the groom, was in black chiffon trimmed with jet beading, hat and shoes to match and a corsage of roses. A dinner was served to the family at the home of the bride's aunt, Mrs. J. Solomon, Esplanade Avenue. Later Mr. and Mrs. Rosenthal left for New York whence they will sail for Florida. Travelling the bride wore a brown and orange faille gown, and brown broadtail coat with hat and shoes to match. The couple will live on St. Luke Street.

Freedman-Rosenstein

The marriage of Shirley, daughter of Mr and Mrs G Rosenstein, to Joseph Freedman son of Mr. and Mrs. L. Freedman was solemnized Sunday, November 9 at 7 p.m. at Chevra Kadisha Synagogue. Rabbi Julius Berger officiated. The columns in the Synagogue were decorated with smilax and roses entwined and the aisles were marked with palms, baskets of bronze and yellow 'mums, oak leaves and satin ribbon, and the altar with a candelabra. Ernie Silver sang "O Promise Me". The bride, who was given away by her father, wore an ivory bridal satin gown on princess lines with slippers to match. Her veil of net arranged with a nose veil was fastened with a wreath of orange blossoms at the back and the bridal flowers were a sheaf of Calla lilies. Miss Sadye Rosenstein was her sister's maid of honor wearing a blue satin turquoise gown with hat and slippers to match. The bridesmaids were Miss Rhoda Berger, wearing pink satin; Freda Avrison, blue satin; Eva Rosensweig, blue satin, Sara Goodman, blue satin, and Julia Rosenstein, orchid satin. Their hats and shoes matched their gowns and they carried bouquets of Johanna Hill roses. Ben Horowitz was page boy. Harry Friedman, brother of the bride, was best man and the groomsmen were Harry Rosenstein, Louis Rosenstein, brothers of the bride, George Newman, Bob Goodman and Louis Harris. Mrs. Rosenstein, mother of the bride, wore black chiffon and lace, black suede shoes, hat to match and a corsage of Talisman roses. Mrs. Friedman, mother of the groom, wore black panne velvet, hat and shoes to match and a corsage of red roses and lily of the valley. A reception was held in the Assembly Hall for 300 guests. Mr. and Mrs. Freedman have left on extended motor trip through the United States. Out-of-town guests were Mrs. Margolies, Misses Rose and Lily Margolies and Joe Margolies, all of New York; Mrs. Gold, of New Jersey; and Mr. and Mrs. Louis Cabran, of Shawinigan Falls.

BRITISH POLICY UNDER DISCUSSION SOON

Prime Minister MacDonald told David Lloyd George, the Liberal leader, November 12, that the Government plans to submit its Palestine policy for discussion in the House of Commons soon. He said the Government planned to fulfill all of its obligations in Palestine and that the recent protests of Jewish and Arab leaders against the declaration of policy was due to a misunderstanding and misinterpretation of the White Paper.

Aid from Liberals again enabled the Laborite Government to escape defeat in the House of Commons last night. A majority of the Liberal members abstained from voting and enabled the passage of a Government resolution regarding the school age bill by a vote of 271 to 242.

Hoover Administration Exercises Care In Approaching Palestine Problem

Decision has been reached by the Hoover Administration to await debates in the British Parliament on the new policy of the MacDonald Government with reference to Palestine for further clarification of the situation before it considers making representations on account of any American interests that might possibly be affected.

Secretary Stimson has previously announced that he was studying the question closely, but the present complicated status of the Palestine problem has caused him to refrain from discussing it.

This attitude is understood to imply no lack of sympathy on the part of the American Government with the Zionist movement. In fact the United States is enthusiastic in regard to plans for the establishment of Palestine as a Jewish national home and has held to this view ever since the interest was advanced during the World War.

Congress has adopted a resolution favorable to the Zionists, from Presidents have expressed their sympathy with it, and under these circumstances the State Department is viewing the problem with complete sympathy from the standpoint of American interests.

Its complications are generally recognized, however, and this is indicated by the fact that no Zionist organizations have yet appealed to the State Department for intervention. Some letters have been received by the department, but these have been only from individuals and not from organizations.

As viewed here, the United States should exercise the utmost care in approaching the problem because of the complexities involved in the administration by Great Britain of its mandate of Palestine. While differences of opinion have arisen among political leaders in Great Britain, it was pointed out today in official circles that the Zionists themselves have had acute and vigorous differences on the subject.

There has been no unity of opinion among the Zionists, it was recalled as to the meaning of the various papers having to do with the British mandate, the convention between the United States and Great Britain on the subject and other phases of the problem, involving what the establishment of a Jewish national home in Palestine really meant and how its details would work out.

All the important papers, however, refer back to the Balfour note of 1917, which stated that the establishment of the home was without prejudice to the rights and position of the other inhabitants of Palestine, without prejudice to any question of religion or other interests and also without prejudice to the rights of Jews outside of Palestine who might be in some way connected or affected by that home.

Therefore, the question, as seen here, involves the balancing of certain very definite problems at best.

At present criticism is being made of the action taken by the British Government in the past year in regard to Jewish immigration into Palestine and as to whether the checking of that immigration is called for. The issues, as viewed here, are so thorny that they are bound to produce differences of opinion and even some acute feeling.

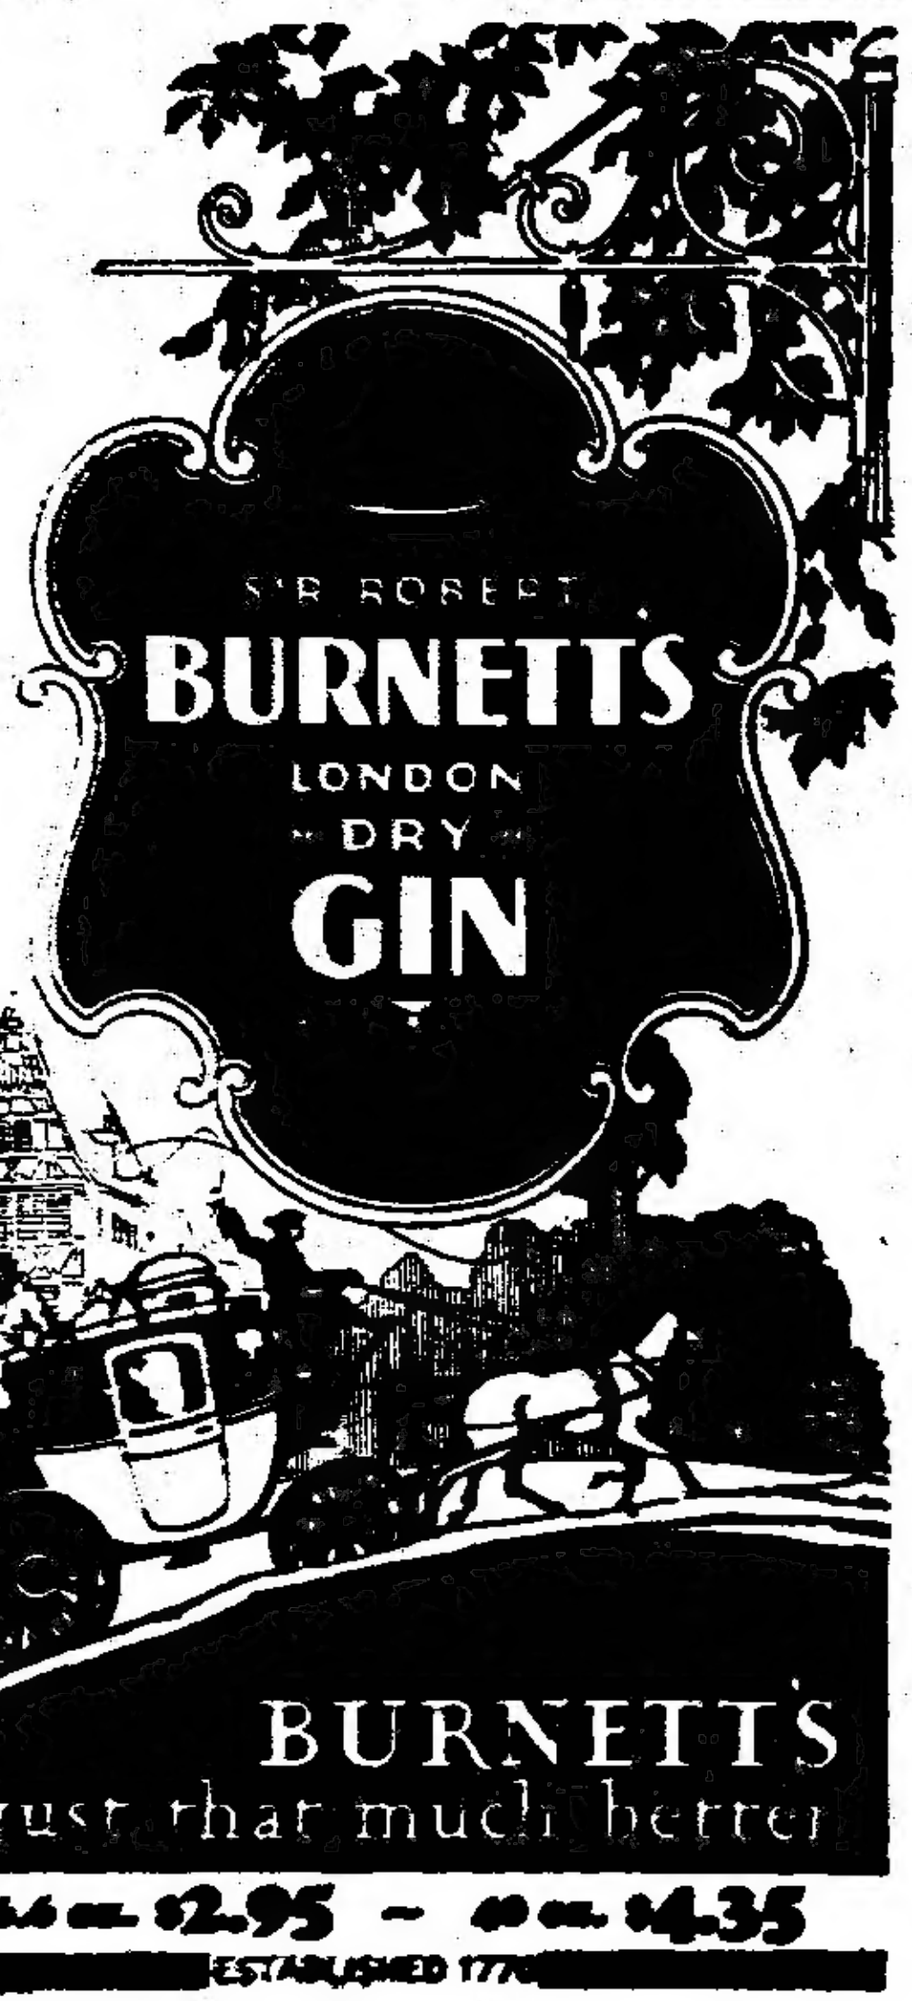
In these circumstances it is felt that treatment of the problem should necessarily come before the British Government. That government is confronted with a division of opinion, as instanced by the sharp criticism of the MacDonald policy in Palestine by such party leaders as Stanley Baldwin of the Conservatives and Lloyd George of the Liberals.

Consequently, it is considered logical that the American Government should await the debate in Parliament on the contention of some Zionists that the new policy is uncalled for.

Moreover, officials here are confident that the issue, when taken up vigorously in Parliament, will find many strong friends of the Zionists to advocate their views.

In this situation the Hoover Administration does not feel warranted at present in injecting the problem of American nationalism into the discussion believing that any outside nation, no matter how interested or what legal rights it may have in regard to the situation should approach a discussion of the matter impending in London with the utmost care.

The issue as it is said is one that must be threshed out in debate while the American Government is confident that its policy of caution will not be interpreted as one of hostility but rather one of friendship.



PALESTINE

When, in 1917, Lord Balfour pledged the British government to "the establishment in Palestine of a national home for the Jewish people" it seemed almost too good to be true. It was too good to be true. It was not true. The pledge, like the conflicting pledge of Constantinople to the Russians, of Syria to the French, of "rectifications" to the Italians, of independence for the Arabs, of self-determination to everybody, arose from no sudden conversion to Zionism; it was a product of war-time distress. Britain needed the help of the Jews and was ready to promise almost anybody almost anything.

Now Britain finds her conflicting promises embarrassing, and the political strategists of the British Empire, balancing Jewish public opinion in the Western world against Arab opinion in the highly inflammable and intensely strategic countries about the Suez Canal and the Persian Gulf, have decided that on the whole it will be safer to let down the Jews than further to inflame the Mus...

Zionist Actions Committee in London Decides to Continue Moderate Policy

Never before has the Zionist movement been through a crisis like the present and never before has its highest authoritative body, the Actions Committee, as it is called, met under greater difficulties than those it faced at a special conference held here last week, writes William Zuckerman in the Montreal Gazette.

Within a fortnight of the issuance of the fateful British Government White Paper Zionist leaders were called upon to decide the most vital problems affecting the very life of British bayonets but must be established in cooperation with the Arabs, even though their hands were red with Jewish blood. The event has proved that British bayonets are frail tools for Jewish support, and Palestine lies in the heart of an Arab world.—The Nation.

their movement and the Zionist ship had to weather the first terrific internal storm called up by the Government's action. The ship has withstood the test without foundering and has emerged from it.

The actions committee wields the greatest degree of constitutional authority within the Zionist movement next to the congress itself. It is, in fact, known in the Jewish world as "The little congress," and it is common knowledge that in matters of practical action and decision "the little congress" is a more effective instrument than the big congress which is always more of a public demonstration than a business gathering.

There were two problems before the "Little Congress" and on the decision taken in regard to them depended the fate and future of Zionism. They were future policy and leadership. In a sense the two questions were one; they were merely two aspects of the same problem. Chaim Weizmann, who led the Zionist movement for twelve years and has now resigned, was not only the leading personality in Zionism he embodied a system both in Palestine and out of it. He stood for a policy of work and ideals which affected profoundly the Jewish world.

Was this system to be changed now that he had resigned? Was the Zionist movement to take an altogether different course, with Dr. Weizmann no longer official leader? In other words, was Dr. Weizmann's resignation only a political demonstration against the British Government's action, or was it also to be an indication that his policy has failed with the Jewish people, too, and that henceforth the Zionist movement was to adopt new aims and new tactics from those it had been following since the end of the war?

Dr. Weizmann's system consisted, first of all, of a policy of complete co-operation with the British Government, a policy he pursued to the point of compromise and often even of abandonment of some of the es-

The decision, of course, is veiled in noble phrases, as in the custom of governments. The decisions of the past, which faced in the other direction, were equally hedged about with qualifying words to which the British government may point as justification for its present action. But only a legalist would do so. For in 1922 Britain, through Winston Churchill, then Colonial Secretary, was explicit that the Jewish people "should know that it is in Palestine as of right and not on sufferance," and added that "for the fulfilment of this policy it is necessary that the Jewish community in Palestine should be able to increase its numbers by immigration." The terms of the mandate granted Britain by the League of Nations two sometimes forget that technically Britain is in Palestine as agent of the League) also provide that Britain shall "facilitate Jewish immigration under suitable conditions and encourage in cooperation with the Jewish Agency close settlement by Jews upon the land." Now Britain finds no suitable conditions for Jewish immigration; the suspension of Jewish immigration ordered last May is confirmed, and the government announces that "there remains no margin of land available for agricultural settlements by new immigrants."

As a result, Dr. Weizmann, Lord Melchett, Felix Warburg, and the other Jewish leaders who have been urging their insistent brethren of the Eastern countries to have faith in Britain have resigned their posts in the Jewish Agency. They feel that the decision of the British Labor Government is a slap in their faces, doubly sharp because of the manner of its announcement. The Zionists had a right, under the terms of the mandate, to expect to be consulted before any such important decision was proclaimed. In their conversations with British officialdom they thought they had been given, as late as last summer, a precisely opposite interpretation. Mr. Warburg, in unusually direct terms, accuses Lord Passfield of deceiving them.

Mr. Baldwin and other Tory leaders have expressed their indignation at the abandonment of the Balfour policy. But the moral of the incident would seem to be: Put not your trust in empire. The Tories may be moved by electoral considerations; they are probably even more moved by fear that concessions to Arabs in Palestine may strengthen Eastern nationalism elsewhere, weakening the British position in Egypt, in the Sudan, about the Persian Gulf, and in India. They differ from the Labor Government in their judgment of the profit to the British Empire—that is all. It would be unrealistic, in 1930, to expect the British Empire, under Laborite, Liberal or Tory, long to defend the Jewish outposts in Palestine for merely sentimental reasons.

This is not Dr. Weizmann's first disillusionment. At Berlin in August, 1921, he had stated frankly his conviction that there could never be a Jewish state in Palestine and advocated something like the Magnes-Buber-Hantn plan of a frank acceptance of bi-nationalism. He resigned. The opposition was too intense. Those who felt then that his goal was too modest, his faith in England too great, must now feel justified. To many Jews the Passfield document will seem a complete justification of the principles of the so-called revisionists who insist that Zionists can be content with nothing less than a Jewish majority, if forced, "even though the native inhabitants are opposed."

It seems to us rather that this latest disillusionment proves the wisdom and clear statesmanship of Judah Magnes, rector of the Hebrew University in Jerusalem. Dr. Magnes was bitterly attacked because he insisted that the Jewish national home must not rest upon

Graciousness and individuality your guests' first impression

Every time a guest steps into your bathroom, a searching appraisal of your most intimate living standard follows. In justice to yourself, then, it is only fair to take particular care in selecting the appointments which reveal your character.

If your building budget is limited you might do well by considering this Crane Nova lavatory. Its simple design, its fine construction will bring to your bathroom an atmosphere of unobtrusive dignity.

And this is vitally important; once you have installed it you will not have to replace it. For in Crane products there is no substitution of cheaper materials. This lavatory, for example, is of twice-fired vitreous china. A ware whose luster cannot be dimmed by time or use; which at all times can be restored to glistening cleanliness by the touch of a damp cloth.

Coupled with a Crane Tarnia tub, and a Crane Sanero Syphon-Jet closet, it signifies, to your guests, good taste and high living standards; to you, a well nigh perfect bathroom, bought for comparatively little.

There are, in the comprehensive Crane line, innumerable such combinations. Not limited to homes alone, but for offices, hotels, clubs, and institutions. If you let us send you the two booklets, New Ideas for Bathrooms and Planning a Small Bathroom, you will find many of them. Better yet, if you are planning to build or remodel visit the nearby Crane Exhibit Rooms; then you will actually see them, and the model installations will help you to visualize them in your home.

Crime aims of—Zionist ideals. The second part of his system was concentration upon economic and constructive work in Palestine in preference to political aims and aspirations.

The first part of his policy hardly came under consideration by the actions committee. Ever since the first almost instinctive outburst of anti-British feeling which followed publication of the White Paper conservative opinion throughout the Jewish world has frowned upon this manifestation of public hysteria. Wild talk of a Jewish Sinn Fein found no echo even among the most extreme Zionists at the conference.

All agreed that the League of Nations, The Hague court and all other instruments of international opinion were friendly to the Jews and should be utilized in convincing the British Government of the advisability of rescinding its White Paper. They also agreed that whatever further work is to be done in Palestine can be done only in co-operation with and not in opposition to the British people.

But while this part of Dr. Weizmann's policy was not even questioned, the other part of it, his constructive and economic work in Palestine, was severely attacked as having been wrong and as having led to and been even, directly responsible for the present crisis.

In the course of a heated, passionate general debate, which is always a feature of these gatherings, a terrific onslaught was made against Dr. Weizmann and his Palestine position. He was violently attacked by the extreme political Zionists known as revisionists, who have fought him so long that their right has by this time lost almost all basis of theory and has taken on the aspects of a vehement personal squabble. They were powerfully assisted by the orthodox "Mizrachi" party from Poland, who had been Dr. Weizmann's allies. The opposing forces were even reinforced by some of the so-called "general Zionists" people of Dr. Weizmann's own party who have now turned against him.

The general complaint against him was that he had "betrayed the legacy of Dr. Herzl," that he had frittered away the ideals of Zionism, that he had converted a movement for the establishment of a Jewish home with a definite Jewish majority in Palestine into a semi-philanthropic relief measures for the colonization of several thousand Jews in Palestine and that this had not been suspended. It was alleged that he had compromised so much with his Zionist ideals that now there was no difficulty for the British Government in nullifying the Jewish national home. The Government's White Paper was no accident, according to his critics, but a direct result of the work and policy of the last decade, for which Dr. Weizmann was directly responsible.

His resignation was not a mere political manifestation; it was an acknowledgment of internal failure, said Dr. Weizmann's opponents. His policy of compromise and practical work on a small scale in Palestine had failed and Zionism, they insisted, must adopt an aggressive political policy based on a Jewish majority in Palestine and on the establishment of a Jewish national home in Palestine in accordance with their interpretation of the Balfour Declaration.

Arguments that a policy of that kind would clearly lead to non-co-operation with the Government, to fights with the Arabs, to friction with Britain, to possible further massacres in Palestine and complication of the Jewish position throughout the world, did not deter Dr. Weizmann's critics. Nor did they avail to show them that such a course was fraught with the gravest danger even to their own movement and meant to "magnify disaster into catastrophe." They were men driven to despair by what they regarded as failure of their movement, and they openly counselled the action of despair. They suggested that the present Zionist executive should tender its resignation immediately with that of Dr. Weizmann and he was not to be permitted even to carry on with the work until the next congress in February, when his successor will be elected.

The moderates portrayed the situation as far from being as desperate as the extremists believe. The White Paper leaves a margin of work even as it is and it is not the Government's last word. It may be modified, withdrawn or not enforced. The Government has practically promised a new interpretation of the document which may enable the work to be carried on even better than before. And even if this does not happen, the present Government does not represent the whole of the British people. The best political opinion in London is against the spirit of the White Paper, according to the moderates, and it will be changed in the end. In the meantime they urged letting Zionism go on with its previous work of economic reconstruction, which is the only work possible and the only work which can lead to eventual establishment of a Jewish national home.

It was one of the most hopeful signs of this "little congress," as well as the strongest indication of the internal strength of the Zionist movement, that even in this critical hour, when emotions ran high and passions were strong, that the moderate elements proved by far the strongest. The actions committee rejected the counsel of despair and elected in principle to follow the same course its old leader had been following. Dr. Weizmann has resigned, but the spirit of his leadership remains. He is no longer president, but he is still pilot of Zionism. Even the terrific blow of the White Paper has not succeeded so far in deflecting the movement from its course. External conditions in Palestine may change, but internally Zionism remains essentially the same as it was.

Ottawa Officials Believe Slump in Stocks has Turned People to Investing in Allowances

Bad times are good times for at least one branch of the Canadian Government. At a time when all other departments are feeling the pinch of depression, when income tax receipts are on the downgrade and customs revenues are declining, the business done by the Annuities Branch is running record volume.

Government officials comment on the fact, strangely enough, with the experience which the Canadian public has had lately with the stock market. The people, they believe, have learned a painful lesson and are profiting by it. They have acquired a distrust of the stock market as a source of wealth and they have turned to some other more dependable institution to secure themselves against the spectre of poverty in their old age.

It was only in 1928 that the Annuities Branch shed its swaddling clothes and stepped out as a real force in the business life of the Dominion. Before that time annuities were available if a person had the patience and the earnestness to go after them. But in 1928 the branch adopted the policy of going after business. It appointed some 40 agents across the country and advertised in the newspapers. The result was phenomenal. With the memory of the stock market crash fresh in their minds people turned to annuities, and in one year the business increased some 300 per cent.

During the past year, according to officials of the branch, this increased business has not only been duplicated but extended. Indications are, they state, that the period will result in an increase of 26 per cent over last year's record total.

Through the Annuities Branch statistics show that Canadians are making provision for their old age at the rate of more than $4,000,000 per year. Since the branch was organized some $25,000,000 has been paid into it.

Already early purchasers are now benefiting under the annuities' plan to the extent of $1,750,000 annually.

E. G. Blackader is the superintendent of the branch.

The Enemy's Gates

By Richmond Barrett

By Special Arrangement with Boni and Liveright

The rough draft of the Battlehill paper that Morton turned out within the hour seemed, to both boys, proof against any professor's sarcasm. It was an intelligent, if rather pallid compilation. The raw material that George had supplied had been drastically winnowed and refined in its passage through his brother's brain.

"Porter won't suspect?" George ventured. "You haven't made it too good?"

"Oh, no!" Morton wasn't worrying. Though he had permitted himself to try a few clever things, he had in general ruled out brilliance in favor of mere safe competence. Compared with his own, this essay was third-rate.

He blew the eraser-dust off the table, arranged the scattered books in a neatly graduated pile and got to his feet.

"Don't go yet." A note of loneliness had come into George's voice. "If you stay five minutes, you won't be late for your bridge game." Under a black scowl, his eyes were full of timid appeal. "Come on up here and smoke one more cigarette."

Morton took out his watch. "It's half past nine now." After deliberating for a single second, he relented. George, who had been slumped down on the small of his back, hitched himself up to a sitting posture to make room for him. Having gingerly brushed off the cushions, Morton climbed up on them.

"You know," he remarked with extreme distinctness as he caught the cigarette and the match box George had thrown at him, "you know that it's all your own fault. You wouldn't have to stay by yourself this way, if you'd just let people be nice to you."

With his head thrown back, George blew a straight jet of smoke out of his lungs. Then, "Never mind that, Morton," he warned. "There's no use starting that argument. I don't want friends. I'd rather keep what pride I've got left."

"All right!" Morton showed no resentment. Before shrugging the topic aside, however, he dropped coolly, "But I don't see how you can talk about pride, when you run around with girls like Molly Banks."

"You and I are different, that's all," George let him know.

"Yes, we are," Morton returned with a smile of brazen good-nature. "I can't help thinking it's low, the way you do; and you disapprove of me, because I do put myself out to make decent friends."

"Oh, I know you're decent and all that." George made the admission with some sadness. "But you are a climber, Morton—you're awful climbers, you and Jessica."

"Maybe we are. You're not doing any climbing, though—that's certain, George." Morton flashed back, his impudent smile broadening.

For a moment, they eyed each other in silence, Morton calm and wholly jaunty, George flushing from a sudden hot rush of anger.

"Oh, well!" George snapped the conversation. "I guess we'd better mind our own business—both of us." He slid down among the pillows and, thrusting his fists into his trousers-pockets, gave himself a confused shake. His glance had veered to the picture of his mother leaning forward in her chair. She seemed to hold him with her unwavering gaze and shamed him out of his wrath.

Morton nodded his understanding. Though he could not see his mother's picture, he had all at once felt her presence, influence, like a firm hand laid on his shoulder. His mouth had grown serious; with one sharp tooth, he bit at his upper lip, traced out the entire curve of it in a series of quick staccato dots—always a sign, with him, of deep reflection. "I suppose it's time we took each other for granted—and let it go at that."

"Yes. You see, we're so damned different." George, forlorn and dashed, came back to that.

Rachel Morgenthal, who survived only as a dimming memory, whose calls to her children sounded fainter and fainter out of the distance, could still at times compel their obedience. Her power had ebbed. She had suffered, to some degree, the fate of all things that have been buried in the earth and under the obliterating debris of recollections. Often her own people, who had loved her, left her to lie forgotten in the darkness of unused braincells. The minds of the living, so cluttered with insignificant unselected impressions of the past, lack the sense of proportion; the light filtering into those obscure storehouses resembles a gray vapor that neutralizes all colors and muddies everything together under a shrouding dusk. George Morgenthal could never adore another human being as he had adored his mother; but even he, though he would strive in a groping anguish to recapture her image, could not make it definite, vivid, complete. Details escaped him; certain expressions that had set her identity apart from all others eluded him. The camera, with a single metallic click of its machinery, had skilfully caught her, while he, her son, could see her only through distorting mists. It was her photograph that kept her before him; his mind failed pitifully to give her a recognizable distinctness.

Despite this fading and dulling of her impression, however, she had not altogether lost her influence. A part of her old spell persisted. With some acute nerve-center she established a contact at infrequent intervals; a thin filament still bound her to the living. If a crisis arose that resembled some scene of years ago, that frail thread would tighten and tug hard at the fiber of her children's hearts. So tonight, the vibration had made itself felt and had averted a senseless quarrel.

The pity of it was that, in the graver emergencies of to-day, Rachel Morgenthal could not aid her family; she had died when they were very young; through the new battles against forces unknown in her lifetime, they must fight their way alone. Her vigor could no longer be communicated to them except on trivial occasions. Her sons were men now; once in a while they lost that status, dwindled to small boys for a few minutes—then they were hers once more, but only then.

They stared at each other now, in a silence that had no hostility. George shook a dejected head; he knew just how close he had come to an ugly outburst. A victory over himself signified little; with his temper, he could never profit by experience, could never look forward unafraid to the next disciplinary test of his endurance. Morton, on the other hand, had speedily recovered his composure and urbanity. With conscious grace, he knocked the ash off his cigarette and ran the palms of his hands over his skull to make sure that his hair was neat. George pulled one fist out of his pocket and dug his knuckles into his eyes, that were watering and smarting from the smoke he had puffed into them. Morton pushed the tray towards him with his foot; but George had already spilled his ashes all over himself.

The statement, "We're so damned different," received incontestable proof from everything these two did, even from their ways of manipulating their cigarettes. Morton could be counted on to make a clean job of his smoking. After each cautious inhalation, he watched the edge of the paper, saw to it that it caught all around and burned down just a fraction of an inch. Every few moments, he moistened his lips with the point of his tongue; so many people's cigarettes got stuck to their mouths and, when they were removed, showed blood-smears from the particles of chapped skin they took with them. With the nail of his little finger, he kept dusting off the neat cone of the fire, so that it glowed through the thinnest coating of ashes and never became clogged. When he had finished, he would pound the head of the half-inch butt against the side of the ashtray and, having extinguished the last spark, would rub his hands together. "Looking for a finger-bowl, Morton?" Jessica had once bluffly inquired at this juncture.

George was a ragged smoker. After he had taken a few puffs, his cigarette would present an untidy gutted appearance. The fire smoldered chokingly, as if the drafts were defective. Sometimes, on top, the paper kept its original keen edge, while underneath it would be all blackened, charred for half its length and fretted into tiny smoked holes. His tobaccos always seemed loosely bedded, not, as with Morton, a compact hard mass like a single coil. But it was useless to argue with George or to tell him how he should tend his little private blaze. He insisted on lying flat on his back, with his hands in his pockets. The wary watchfulness of the accomplished smoker annoyed him. He considered that, to enjoy a cigarette, a man must be sprawlingly relaxed. Miserable, blinking, half-blinded, he yet refused point-blank to modify his views.

Morton was inspecting him now with his usual air of bright, slightly foppish superiority. Handsome—yes, he supposed George was handsome; but to himself he confessed without shame that he preferred his own type of good looks. Certainly Morton had a sleekness, a speckless gloss that George lacked. His flesh was as tightly stretched as the skin of a grape over the plump ripened pulp; he resembled, in fact, some specimen out of a hothouse that, before being placed at the very top of the basket, has been lovingly rubbed and polished up with a piece of soft flannel. Not a bone of his skeleton showed; he seemed to have been poured into a human mold and, when the fluid ingredients had congealed, to have been turned out, a figure of smooth rich solidity. He did not weigh an ounce too much, however, full-bodied, he remained slender. He still had the high waist, the womanish spread of hips that had given him such a queer archaic shape as a small boy; but the peculiarity was only structural. Inside his sinuous hairless body, there functioned the mind of a cold-blooded male, a mind of extraordinary clarity and refinement. He hated rankness, recoiled in disgust from any unclean touch. If he ever married, he didn't choose to have his ecstasy with a decent girl stained and fouled by sordid recollections. His habitual expression of bland complacency was justified; he could bear his own sharp scrutiny unabashed. He approved of himself, both physically and mentally; therefore he was happy.

Picking his steps through life with a cat-like daintiness, Morton could not help feeling sorryful of his brother. George, always in trouble, always floundering about in the mire, carried back with him, out of noxious puddles, something of their atmosphere, a reminder as distressing to Morton as an actual reek in his sensitive nostrils.

I might have had an anchor."

Clarence Darrow, who will debate with Rabbi Brickner in Toronto November 26th on "Is Man A Machine?" is as good a subject for a column as though he were of specific Jewish interest to readers. He is neither a Jew nor a non-Jew. Wherever there is a single liberal-thinking person Clarence Darrow can be greeted as a blood brother and the common classifications fall away. He is a great man and his intrinsic greatness lies in his sensitive imagination which has bounded him out of the ruts of contentment to places where the under-dogs of humanity will get a spokesman.

Clarence Darrow is more than seventy years of age and has heard unconventional views discussed from earliest childhood. Back in the little Ohio village of Kinsman, his father, a furniture manufacturer, was known as the "village atheist." He had been ordained as a Unitarian preacher but doubt was too strong within him to allow him to serve as a minister. The Darrow children went to school but their father taught them at home, too, and they heard many discussions on radical ideas of religion and politics. A neighbor of theirs was a justice of the peace as well as a lawyer and Clarence Darrow borrowed law books from him.

Darrow was a practising lawyer at the age of thirty when he came to Chicago and won the limelight through an impromptu speech on free trade he made at a meeting of Democrats. He was corporation counsel for the Northwestern Railway when the Haymarket riots and the execution of the labor leaders touched his sympathies and led him to acquaint himself with other things and the fight for the eight-hour day and other changes. In 1894 when the strike of the American Railway Union against the Pullman Company became a fight between all the railroads and the strikers, and Eugene Debs was thrown into jail for contempt of court, it was the work for Darrow. At once he gave up all hope of ever becoming prosperous as a railway lawyer and devoted himself to defending Debs. The sight of an able, passionate, keen, ambitious corporation lawyer throwing away a career to become Debs' advocate was something new and made Darrow a idol of the common man. He became famous as Debs' unfailing defender. It was apparent that the reason for this was not the friendship across. Darrow had no scheme for using the good-will of the common man to help him play for high political stakes. He was the champion of the defenseless because their troubles touched him so much that he had no choice.

From what he said at Darrow must come to us that it is plain that he is against the capitalistic system and he understands what life is and must mean to the big and little men who fight for such things as prosperity and poker and what he says that he wants "Crime, Its Cause and Treatment," at a time when Mussolini and the two bootleggers or friends dinging to his neck are running riot in the papers. During a court recess newspaper reporters have seen the seats, stick, disengaged, dressing counsel drawn together in a worried knot of conference while Darrow was out listening attentively to a policeman or bootlegger plan informing on what this world needs. Darrow's optimism and pessimism are always good-natured. He is genial, too, when irritated and even if he use dirty words he gets away with it. Those who have heard Darrow maintain that, with all the knowledge and weight of logic which are his, the weapons which really undermine and take the sting out of his opponents are his silky satire, his humor, and his ever genial scoring.

It is hard to reconcile Darrow's concern for the ordinary human being, the ease with which he identifies with folks, and his obvious pleasure in his own vigorous, emotional life with his complete intellectual pessimism, his thorough-going disillusionment in the race. This universal despair was proclaimed in public in the memorial address which Darrow delivered after his brother-in-law, John Howard Moore, a naturalist, killed himself in Jackson Park, Chicago. Darrow said: "He believed that the blind and heartless world would listen to his words and mend its ways. But humanity went on mating and mocking, living and dreaming, marrying and dying, and never heard his voice. One day he opened his eyes and saw it was a ruin, and, feeling the weight of the universal sorrow on his soul, he took his life. The coroner's jury determined that he died from his own hand, while suffering under a temporary fit of insanity. I tell you he died from his own hand while suffering from a temporary fit of sanity. Poor, dear dreamer! You are not the last mortal to learn the truth. Other men have awakened from the mad and blissful dream, saving mankind from itself."

Darrow expounded the mechanistic philosophy of life during the famous Leopold-Loeb trial in Chicago and thereby saved two young murderers from the electric chair. With his tremendous talent for dramatizing an issue he had the world listening from afar while he made the plea that man is a machine, that he is not responsible for what he does, that he commits the deeds he does because of stimuli from without. Darrow now believes that no man is a free-will agent, a person of infinite possibilities. He believes that man is beyond saving through his own intelligence; that man is ruled by his emotions instead. Darrow neither excuses nor excuses man for his futility, his bestiality, his blind cruelty and injustice toward his fellow man. He believes that man has no more purpose in life than the amoeba; both wriggle around and get along as they can.

Darrow's philosophy will be explained in the Holy Blossom Temple debate: "Is Man A Machine?" The occasion will give the intelligentsia people of Toronto an opportunity to see America's best-known criminal lawyer and to hear the enemy of standardization and hide-bound prejudice, the opponent of all intolerant people who sit in judgment on the imperfect others. They will see and hear the friend by choice of the beaten, the hunted, the despised, the feared, the dispossessed, the lowly. In Clarence Darrow they will see one of the truly great, unique personalities of this time.

Permeable only by blighting damps, George drank them into his very soul; he had his mother's capacity for deep gloom. The sunny influences that acted on Morton exercised no power over him.

In considering himself the better-looking of the two, Morton had been more than a trifle biased in his own favor. Besides, George was unmistakably a Jew; that in itself damaged him in the estimation of Morton. Despite his crisply crinkled black hair, the liquid glisten of his eyeballs and the rich Oriental dye of the blood suffusing his skin, Morton could have passed in his own person for a young American with vague foreign forebears. Examined beside his brother, however, he was sometimes robbed of that distinction and relentlessly classified.

In every feature, George revealed his lineage. He was the handsome Jew at bay. In profile, the bold straight downstroke of his nose-bone ended in a sharp triangle that, overhanging the upper lip, held the slant taut slits of the nostrils. Off his narrow forehead, his hair was swept back in retreating regular waves. He had the lean jaw and stony cheek-bones of the man who all his life has fronted unfair adversities. His full blood-colored mouth was of an almost feminine appeal, set in a face of such chiseled keenness.

Morton would have found a perfect setting in a gallery of conventional sculptures; his suave modeling would have satisfied the tourist's quest for finished art. George, spare stripling though he was, belonged with the stunted Titans of Rodin and Michelangelo. A look of diabolical pride mingled with his panicky sylvan shyness. He was strangely like Lucifer the fallen rebel, inured to darkness, flinching from the rays of the sun into which he had once stared in unwinking arrogance. Upon his face had been graven the plight of his people.

"Now I've got to get out," Morton, bounding to his feet, spoke with absolute finality.

While he was adjusting his muffler in becoming folds for the short trip across Vanderbilt Court, he remarked in a loud indignation, "Last night I was simply furious—and Alec was furious, too. We'd made a date with Tom Cousens to play bridge in his room. He promised to have a fourth. And what do you think?"

He swung around on George, who had crawled down off the window-seat and was helping helping him into his coat.

"He's picked out somebody that didn't suit you," George promptly supplied.

"Yes, he had." Morton nodded, his eyes flashing. "Of course I've never liked Tom Cousens. Still, he seemed all right in his way and he does play good bridge. But—" he held the suspense for a second, then continued, "when Alec and I got there last night, who should be sitting down at the table and shuffling the cards but Dave Levy!"

"Well, after all, why shouldn't he shuffle the cards?" George asked, slyly misinterpreting Morton's rage.

"Don't try to be humorous, George," Morton rebuked him. "Think of Levy—nobody even speaks to him on the street. And then to have to play cards with him! Imagine his accepting Tom's invitation, in the first place."

George, serious now, weighed the problem. "Funny — awfully funny what people will do," he mused. "He probably thought it would lead to something, get him in with the right crowd. I bet he sees his mistake today."

"He certainly does," Morton shouted. "Things weren't very pleasant for him last night, I can tell you."

After a puzzled silence George shrugged disgustedly. "But I don't suppose he minds — his hide's too tough," he decided. During that brief pause, he had visualized the scene of the evening before and had taken a scornful measure of Levy, who had courted the insult and must have submitted to it without shame. "He's a rat, Levy is. If Tom ever asks him again, he'll be back—don't worry."

"They'll have to play two-handed solitaire, then," Morton returned. "Levy would be bad enough, God knows, if he was clean." He wrinkled up his nose and sniffed the air.

"Oh, I've sat next to him in class." George's face expressed an even sicker distaste than Morton's. "I don't believe he ever takes a shower. Sometimes he smells—honestly he does."

"He did last night," Morton answered. "I had it out with Tom this morning. I didn't leave him a leg to stand on."

"You wouldn't." George gave him a wry grim smile and walked with him to the door. "Good night, old man." He patted him on the shoulder. "Drop in again to-morrow, will you?"

"Why don't you come over to my room for a change?" Morton suggested. "The three of us could have dinner at the Bishop."

George, staring down his legs, hesitated. "No—you and Alec had better call for me here. Make it six o'clock. I've got a date at seven-thirty." With challenging bravado, he raised his eyes and asked Morton straight in the face. "I have with Molly," he wound up.

"Alec has a five o'clock class." Morton feebly formulated an excuse. "We might be late. How about the day after to-morrow?" It was obvious that he had no intention of shaping his engagement to suit the convenience of Miss Molly Banks.

"Oh, all right," George agreed. "Day after to-morrow at about six-thirty."

When the door had shut behind Morton, George remained motionless for a time and, with dreary discouragement, surveyed the silent room. He hated to be alone there. The stillness seemed to him an actual ponderable substance that increased the pressure of the air against his body and made him feel like a man who swims, with bursting lungs, under water. He had a passionate longing for companionship—need of it as goading as a physical hunger; but he preferred to hug himself together and suffer the pangs of his starvation, rather than risk a rebuff.

Stretching his arms over his head, he yawned—just to pierce through the deep quiet and hear a comfortable human sound. Then, jerking back his head and knocking his skull in rhythmic persistence against a panel of the door, he stared up at the ceiling. He could not get Levy out of his mind. With a sensation of disloyalty to his own blood, he had stumbled upon the discovery that Morton and Levy were playing the same unscrupulous game. It had taken him to think of it made his fanatical family pride wince; but his brain could not be diverted from its reluctant investigation. However profitless it might appear—any attempt to reduce Morton and Levy to a common denominator—George suddenly knew, to his sharp chagrin, that he himself had solved the problem. Morton, the snob, and Levy, the greasy little sycophant, used antipodal methods. Levy, cuffed and booted into corners, never lost his smirk or the furtive guile of his prominent slimy eyes. He was forever nosing along the trail of his persecutors, slipping between their legs and barring their passage in a cringing obstinacy. Morton, his head high, his expression one of airy hauteur, pushed and shouldered his way into prominence. But the underlying purpose of both boys was to get ahead at any cost. If some chemical experiment could have purged off all their surface differences, the irreducible residue, the last cold quintessential drops in the test-tubes, would have matched. Loathing Levy, George could find excuses for him: the son of an ignorant rag-dealer had no traditions to dishonor: but Morton, with generations of culture back of him, was acting the part of a traitor to the ancient household gods. Every slight he provoked cheapened and sullied his name. George, though he had little esteem for himself, still considered that, by virtue of being a Morgenthal, he was one of the mighty. Anger stirred in him whenever he heard his brother gayly deny his race. Morton had the power to belly an ordinary lie into the genuine ballot that he was by no possible interpretation a Jew. His antipathy to Levy, his refusal to speak to him on the street, resulted in part from his dirtiness but principally from the fact that he was a Jew. "Jews don't appeal to me—it's an instinctive dislike," Morton often explained, with dazzling effrontery, to his friends; and at present, after three and a half years in New Haven, he was being taken at his word in several quarters. This morning, Conners had in all probability uttered a meek apology for inflicting one of the despised tribe upon him.

Often before tonight, George had found Morton out; but he could never grow calloused to the truth. And this new idea—this association of Morton and Levy in his mind was a real torment.

"That's the one thing you've got to grant father," George, as he peered up at the ceiling, spoke out with a startling distinctness. The words seemed to unsettle the oppressive quiet, to plow a wake through the air of the room. He raised his eyebrows in surprise and smiled with a certain embarrassment at the realization that he'd been caught talking to himself.

"Well, it's true," he retorted to an unuttered protest. "I don't care, it's true." That his father and he might have formed a staunch and strengthening alliance, he knew; but for ten years he had hoarded a grievance and sought to distill it down to a subtle poison that would eat its way into all his thoughts about Morgenthal. It would have been perfidy to his mother to retain any affection for the man who had caused her so much suffering. A tiny flicker of the old childish admiration persisted, however, and could not be extinguished. For Morgenthal, like his wife, was unfalteringly proud; to descend from his isolation, to enter with bribes into the Christian camp—that he would never do. The sting of his lust had betrayed him lately into more and more questionable exploits; something of his former financial prestige had gone; but his devotion to his family honor remained untarnished. George, holding his father off, refusing to negotiate with him except on terms of distant politeness, at times was full of an aching desire to confide in him. Instead, as by an injection of spleen into his blood, he would drug and paralyze the urgent impulse.

Swiftly, as George's thought turned from Morton to Mark, there swept back upon him the memory of a day last year when the longing to blurt out his misery to his father had almost overpowered him. He had just been dealt the trickiest of blows: Morton, brazenly cruel, had struck for his freedom. After living with George for three years in New Haven, he had picked a new roommate for himself and casually announced the fact. Even then, however, the need of consolation in George had gone down before the fierce strength of the enmity he bore his father. He'd got sick and tired of being bossed by Morton—sick and tired of it; that was the only explanation of the break he could bring himself to utter. Had the real truth of the matter ever come to Morgenthal, it would have aroused in him something akin to hatred for his arrogant younger son.

The rights of the case had not all been on George's side. Morton's position had had some justice. He had grown more and more disgusted with his brother, that spring, in his dogged circlings around little Molly Banks; it had vexed him to watch the hot quest, to see the man lapse into the panting animal. He had known just how the hunt would end. Meanwhile, he had applied himself to the steady building up of his friendship with Alec Clarke—a polite, scrupulously decent youth, who had clean blue eyes and a mouth of pouting innocence; whose pink cheeks were covered with a furry down, like peach-bloom, and whose character was as malleable as warm wax.

At the very moment when Morton had Clark just where he wanted him, poor George had stayed out all night. Returning to the dormitoryr at nine o'clock of a bright May day, half-scared at being plunged into the sunshine after the throbbing darkness of the night, he had received a single steel-cold glare from Morton. Neither said a word. Morton asked for no explanation. George offered none. He crept guiltily into his own room, shut the door, pulled down the shade and, too weary to make a complete job of his undressing, crawled into bed in his underclothes.

It was a Sunday. Morton, coming back at noon from the Episcopal church where he worshipped with ostentatious regularity, had strolled into George's room. The scapegrace lay on back and yanked with both hands at his tousled hair, in the ineffectual attempt to work out the snarls.

"Hello!" He ventured an abashed glance at Morton.

Morton, all a radiant glaze of Sabbath spotlessness, looked down with serene disdain into the upset eyes of his brother.

"Hello!" His greeting was loud but quite non-committal.

George flung his arms up over his head. "I know you're disgusted — I don't blame you." With the clangor of church-bells in his ears, and in his mind the thought of the cleansing air outside his shut window, he was passionately contrite. "I'm disgusted myself, Morton." He stretched and a shudder went through him, down to his very toes—a shudder of utter lassitude, but with a thrill of remembrance in its quiver.

HON. J. D. MONTEITH, Minister

Factory Inspection Branch: Chief Inspector, JAMES T. BURKE

The Factory, Shop and Office Building Act of Ontario requires that no child under 14 years of age be employed in a factory or shop.

It shall not be lawful for a youth, young girl or woman to be employed for more than 10 hours in one day, nor more than 60 hours in any one week.

In every factory the employer shall allow every youth, young girl and woman therein employed not less than one hour at noon of each day for meals but such hour shall not be counted as part of the time herein limited as respects the employment of youths, young girls and women.

Employees will observe that abstract cards posted in the factories enable them to become acquainted with their protection under this Act.

For particulars as to further requirements of the Factory, Shop and Office Building Act of Ontario, communicate with the Chief Inspector of Factories, East Block, Parliament Buildings, Toronto. Telephone Adelaide 1261.

NORTHERN ONTARIO CANADA

Northern Ontario, now open for settlement at fifty cents per acre, contains millions of acres of the finest agricultural land in the world. Its resources in lumber, minerals, water power, fish, game and scenery are immense. The land calls for men to cultivate it, and in return will give health, comfort and prosperity.

What settlers say of the soil, climate, farming, and forest life, is told in a most attractive booklet issued under the direction of the Honourable Thomas L. Kennedy, Minister of Agriculture for Ontario. Full instructions as to regards to acquiring a title to these rich agricultural lands are also given.

For free copies write: G. A. ELLIOTT, Director of Colonization, Parliament Buildings, Toronto, Ontario. "Please mention this paper."

WHAT THE ZIONIST STAND SHOULD BE

By Gershon Gelber, of Windsor, Ont.

Recent developments in Palestine and the final upshot of the last White Paper of Lord Passfield, only tends to prove, if proof was required, that we cannot safely trust and place our fate and destiny in the hands of any one single nation, however virtuous and well-meaning at the time of accepting the mandatory task, that nation may be.

In the course of subsequent unforseen events that are bound to develop in this ever-changing strategy of world politics, this nation will by nature of things surely apply that primitive principle of "self-preservation first" and as soon as their interest will clash with our interest the latter is bound to suffer. This is only to be expected. Any other nation finding itself in Britain's present position would act likewise. And having regard to this indisputable truth, we must as a consequence be left to the caprices of fortune and to the whims of that sole protector or benefactor of ours.

We are ready to admit whatever the motive might have been on November 2nd, 1927, Britain meant well when she issued that famous Balfour Declaration pledging her best endeavors to facilitate the establishment of Palestine as a national home for the Jewish people. Proof of this, is the fact, that, to pacify the Arab Moslem world so that Palestine as a national home for the Jews would not be called into question, it was arranged that the Arabs who until then had no national home, were allotted 4 separate and distinct States, namely: (1) Mesopotamia, (2) the Hedjaz, (3) Syria, (4) Transjordonia, the latter state has even been sliced off of Palestine of which it always was, since the days of Joshua, part and parcel. These states have been granted to an Arab population of 10,000,000 while the small and curtailed Palestine, the land of our ancestors, has been promised to a Jewish population of 17,000,000.

During a debate in the British House of Commons last December, Drummond Shields, Under-Secretary for the Colonies, replied to a question raised that neither McMahon nor any one in authority in the British Government pledged in 1915 or, at any time, that Palestine is to be incorporated in the Arab states. This dispels the Arab claim repeatedly used as a means to invalidate the Balfour Declaration.

This position was well understood by all, and in this spirit the Governments of the World acted when they subscribed to that declaration at San Remo and entrusted Great Britain with the Mandate. And furthermore, even the Arabs themselves understood this to be the case, as we find, that Emil Feisal the spokesman for the Arab world representing his father, King Hussin at the Peace Conference wrote on March 1st, 1919, to Professor Felix Frankfurter then in Paris representing the Zionist's cause, that the Arabs look with deepest sympathy on the Zionist movement and that they wish the Zionists a most hearty welcome home.

This has been for some time after taken for granted by all concerned as a settled and closed matter, as all post war territorial settlements were.

It was only considerably later, when the Arabs noticed the change in the way the wind was blowing caused by the British officials sent there to carry out the provisions of the Mandate, either by direction of their superiors in London, or because the Jews would not tolerate in their own Homeland being considered and treated as "natives," that a new party with the Grand Mufti leading, sprang up with nationalistic tendencies and aspirations. Being encouraged by these officials, it would have been surprising had it not culminated in the riots of August 1929. Following these riots, the Shaw Commission was sent there and made a miserable job of whitewashing, so adjudged by the opinion of the civilized world as expressed recently during the session of the Mandate's Commission. To give it a second coat of whitewashing, Simpson was sent and true to his mission, he brought a report, the finding of which was only to be expected, and as a result of this, Passfield issued his last White Paper.

Some go as far as to suspect, that in order to pacify Ghandi and the Moslems in India, Britain is prepared to offer Palestine as a sacrifice on its altar. Some suggest economic reasons, fearing that the Jews with their inherent business acumen might develop into another competitor for the Eastern market to the disadvantage of the British export, the old fear of King Pharoah "lest they multiply, etc." —

However, whatever the actual reasons are, the Labour Government has by its last White Paper, thrown to the winds the transparent veil of diplomacy under which they shrouded their acts, and have at last come out in their true colors, showing that they are ready to nullify the entire British obligation to a people of 17,000,000, solemnly pledged in 1917 when Britain needed the support of World Jewry, as expressed by Churchill in his recent letter to the press.

It would be amusing, were it not so tragic, to hear the aged Passfield complain that he cannot understand why the Jews should protest at all, on the contrary, they should acclaim him as the Saviour of the Jewish Homeland. To say that his actions show an attempt to nullify or even modify the Balfour Declaration is beyond his comprehension.

And to prove his contention, he points to page 20 of his White Paper (which he issued with the sole object of being for our own good and welfare) that further immigration of our people should be stopped only as long as there are unemployed Arabs. Supposing that it is natural for a great number of Arabs to be most of the time unemployed, being lazy and shiftless, as a result Jews would be barred from the country indefinitely, but what of it? Have we not got the Balfour Declaration? Then why complain? He also points further to another clause which disqualifies those that have entered the Promised Land from buying land. Now, could anything be more reasonable? Could any nation wish for a better home? . . . . .

The only feature in this dark hour is: that the Socialistic Government does not represent the true British opinion, as is evidenced by the protests voiced by the greatest statesman of all parties, yet, under present conditions, even with a change of Government in England, we do not stand on solid ground, we are rather building on sand.

To overcome this unsatisfactory state of affairs we should ask that the mandate over Palestine be entrusted and placed in the hands of the League of Nations. As Palestine is recognized and guaranteed by the nations of the world as reserved for a Jewish National Home, it is only fitting that this League representing these nations should assume the task of carrying out those obligations. In this way, no single power will use Palestine for its particular convenience to serve its own ends. Having this assurance, and all obstacles from our path removed, the Jews of the world will come forward and pour money and labour with renewed and intensified energy, that within a generation the country will become once again a land flowing with milk and honey.

TREATMENT

The treatment of disease, in many cases, represents an attempt to deal with a condition which should never have occurred, because it could have been prevented.

When illness does occur, treatment should be secured. That is not the time to discuss prevention. Early treatment is really preventive in large measure, because such treatment very often will prevent the development of more serious conditions.

In practically every case of advanced disease, that case will have passed through a period when the disease was not severe or serious. If such cases had been properly treated during this early mild stage, much would have been accomplished in the prevention of the severe later stages.

One of the conditions which exists today and which results in a tremendous amount of suffering is the attempt made by people to treat themselves.

Proper treatment cannot be prescribed without knowing what the condition is that it is desired to treat. A diagnosis must always precede treatment. Diagnosis of disease is the most important service the physician gives his patient. The individual thinks that the symptom is nothing important, merely a little indigestion, biliousness or some such condition, and then he prescribes for himself, thinking that he knows what is wrong with him. This is merely guess-work, however. What he should do is to consult his doctor, who, after having made a diagnosis, will prescribe whatever means are available to deal with that particular condition.

It is comparatively easy to diagnose an acute or advanced case of illness, but diagnosis is difficult in the early stages. In other words, the untrained person is attempting to do the more difficult thing, and it is only when he is very ill that he calls in his doctor. People still say that they are "sick enough to have a doctor."

Every minor illness does not lead to an acute serious condition, but there are tremendous numbers of adults coming to their physicians for the first time, seeking relief for well-advanced heart, kidney or other similar disease. They come to the physician at a time when medical science can do little for them. In the early stages of the condition, they dosed themselves with this or that because someone had told them it was good, and the result is that they missed the help of medical science when it might have done a great deal for them.

The more that people make use of their physicians for bringing to their aid the benefits of medical science early in disease, the less often will they call upon them to treat the long drawn out serious conditions that grow out of the improperly treated or neglected illnesses which are thought to be of little or no importance, and about which it is not necessary to secure advice.

In order to secure the most from medical science, have a health examination once a year as an aid to keeping well.

Questions concerning Health addressed to the Canadian Medical Association, 184 College Street, Toronto, will be answered personally by letter.
